MEET THE POLAR VORTEX

Plate 1. Typical summer (top) and winter (bottom) paths of the Jet Stream over North America

Plate 2. The weekend of 2013 January 4-5, showing the deep southward dip reached by the Jet Stream to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico; also the extent of the cold weather completely surrounding Newfoundland, the St Lawrence Valley and the Great Lakes.

UNTIL THIS YEAR most of us had never heard of the Polar Vortex, but for the last few weeks we have grown to know it well. Starting in early December, we began to notice its effect on us when we were hit by some heavy snowfalls and cold weather. Now here we are a month later and it is still causing discomfort, distress, injury, and in some instances even death to people all over North America.

The Polar Vortex is not a new phenomenon, and professional meteorologists have known about it for a long time. It has always been there, a very cold air mass rotating around the North Pole. It usually stays where it belongs, but this year it has strayed further south and its frigid air has resulted in extreme cold temperatures across much of the continent as far south as the Gulf of Mexico.

Normally the Polar Vortex is kept in place by the Jet Stream, a high altitude current of air that crosses the continent from west to east. On weather maps the Jet Stream can be seen as a gigantic U-shape looping from Canada's northwest, then dipping southwards almost to the Gulf of Mexico, then turning north again to leave the continent somewhere near Newfoundland (See Plate 1 and Ref 1). Its air currents travel at varying speeds around 100 to 200kph and are useful for jet aircraft which on longer flights normally fly at around 9,000m (30,000ft) roughly the elevation of Mount Everest. Helped along by the Jet Stream jetliners can reduce flying time by a half hour or more between Canada and Europe, a significant cost saving.

This winter, for some reason, the Jet Stream shifted further south (Ref 2 & Ref 3), allowing the Polar Vortex to extend further south than usual, causing our frigid weather. Usually the cold air will leak southwards slowly, causing only brief cold snaps that are soon lost in the general warmth of southern latitudes, but this year a much larger mass of cold air has moved further south with the Jet Stream. But so far scientists have no explanation of exactly why the Jet Stream is weaker, although it has been suggested that areas of Arctic ice and snow cover reduced by global warming may be involved.

Meanwhile, we suffer through these Arctic blasts which in some parts of North America have produced temperatures rivalling those of Antarctica. Meteorologists say that these conditions should not last too long, but for those are down, whose power lines are down, and whose roads are skating rinks periodically blocked with mountains of snow, not to mention the cost of heating and dealing with all this, it has already been too long.

In his Ode to the West Wind, the English poet Percy Bysshe Shelley (1824–1897) asked, “If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?” Right now, the answer looks like, “Yes, it surely can!”

SOME THOUGHTS ON CURRENT CANADIAN POLITICS

ANYONE WHO READS MY EDITORIALS in this publication should have no uncertainty about my feelings regarding Stephen Harper and his government. I can honestly state that I have never felt so negative towards any government, either here in Canada or even in England where I grew up and first became interested in politics. I would unequivocally say that the PM and his ‘government’—I find it hard to use that word for the current federal Conservatives whom I prefer to call a ‘*mis*government’—are unquestionably the most narrow-minded, mean-spirited and misdirected group of individuals ever to hold national power in Canada.

The Harperites have cut funding for social programs like Health, UI and other important services like the Canada Census, the Canada Food Inspection Agency, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Marine Search & Rescue, Veterans’ support, etc. They have also cut funding for dozens of research programs, forcing the highly qualified researchers themselves to leave the country to seek employment in the USA, Britain, and other countries where the governments encourage and value such work. (See page 4 and The Silence of the Labs.) At the same time they have given gigantic tax cuts to large corporations, and allowed the sale of valuable Canadian resources and assets to foreign competitors. They have also spent some hundred million dollars on partisan advertising of their Economic Action Plan (you can see these ads on television) to make us think they are being generous when in fact they are simply using our dollars we paid out earlier in federal taxes. And to cap it all, the Canadian jobless rate rose from 6.9% to 7.2% in December, with more than 45,000 jobs lost.

But perhaps the worst actions of the Harperites are evidenced in their undemocratic refusal to allow sufficient time for meaningful discussion in the House of Commons of their monstrous budget “omnibus bills” which include everything except the kitchen sink!

While I believe the government of Kathy Dunderdale has some flawed policies, this may apply to any government. But they do not exhibit such intensely ideological tunnel vision as the Harperites. True, they have combined, perhaps ill-advisedly in the opinion of many, all the English school boards into one Mega School Board for the entire province; their Access to Information Bill 29 was rammed through with minimal debate and much criticism, a tactic perhaps learned from Harper; and there has been neglect and poor decisions affecting the fishery. Like Harper, Ms Dunderdale has sometimes avoided public comment until compelled, as we saw in her silence during the first days of the recent electricity blackouts. And her government has shown weakness in standing up to their federal counterparts tempting one to believe they were afraid to offend the PM by Harping On about things they think he might not like!

But there’s a couple of things the Dunderdale crowd have done, that I can applaud. One is the recent moratorium on fracking to remain in effect until more information is available. My concern there however is the possibility that they may finally give in to the pressures of big oil, or be over-ridden by the oil-obsessed Harperites.

Credit for the second thing should probably go in part at least to Danny Williams: that is Muskrat Falls. If there is any doubt about the need for this project, the recent electrical power problems should have dispelled it. We need the electricity the project will generate, and sharing the cost and surplus power with Nova Scotia is the way to go, since the Holyrood plant must be terminated and its years of pollution must be cleaned up. The planned pooling of effort with Nova Scotia will give Newfoundland efficiencies of scale, boosting our province’s independence. It can create potential also to make us leaders in production of cheaper, cleaner energy enabling Atlantic Canada to develop new industry and to sell for decades into the future when offshore oil has become a distant memory. In addition, the strengthening of the four Atlantic Provinces will become increasingly important if, as is likely, the balance of power persists in its westward shift, especially if Québec continues to push for sovereignty which could result in the physical division of Canada.

A word to those who raise alarmist issues about the escalating future cost of Muskrat Falls hydro power: Do those who voice such concerns really believe that hydroelectrical energy will be more costly than oil in the future? Oil, including fracked oil, will face its own escalating costs, will become a greater environmental burden as time passes, and will eventually be exhausted anyway; but the Muskrat Falls project, though expensive to build, will have relatively stable operating costs after completion, with benefits as lasting for Newfoundland as Churchill Falls has been for Québec—otherwise why would Hydro-Québec have so assiduously opposed the Muskrat Falls project?

If, as may happen, Canada finds herself saddled with more oil-obsessed leaders like Harper, this Province’s hydroelectric power may soon provide enough economic clout for Newfoundlanders & Labradorians to be heeded on the federal scene to finally allow us a real say in how this country of Canada is to be run.

In their efforts relating to Muskrat Falls, I believe that we should support our present Provincial Government as well as whatever government we may choose to continue the work after the next provincial election. We will then be able to echo the words of past NL Premier Brian Tobin and say with confidence, “have-not will be no more”.

LIBRARY NOTES

 Susan Harvey

Still finding some thing to read at the library. A couple of new acquisitions, one or two from the Newfoundland Collection, and have a look at the shelves of books which have been there all the time! I found several more by John Grisham, and also a Martha Grimes I had missed out on. Hopefully there will be enough treasure there to keep us going, until maybe the rotating collections come back?

1. King and Maxwell is an exciting story featuring two private detectives called - surprise! - Sean King and Michelle Maxwell. This is a further adventure of the two, and apparently they have also been featured in a TV series. They are an unusual pair in that the woman, Michelle, is not only a full partner in deciding strategy, but she is also the strong and tough member of the pair. The plot of the book is somewhat political (American political - they meet the president) and international (starts out in Afghanistan) and fairly complicated. K and M get involved with a teenage boy whose father has been declared killed in action, but seems to have been in contact with his son after his official death. There is a great deal of secrecy to be dealt with; but they manage, with the help of friends and some pretty slick work with the internet, to discover what the big secret was and who wanted so desperately to keep the secret. A number of people are killed quite cold-bloodedly, and K and M are at risk several times. A good read.

2. Pure Joy was a bit of a surprise. Ms Steel is known for her many romantic novels, but this book is about the many dogs she has owned. She really loves her dogs, especially the most recent, a teacup Chihuahua named Minnie Mouse. The book contains some good advice about owning dogs, and also her other passion, children. It is hard to imagine how Ms Steel managed to write the many books she is credited with, at least 90, in a household containing nine children, eleven dogs, and a pig. There were also at least two husbands over the years. She made trips to Paris on a regular basis, taking Minnie with her. She very much enjoyed all the dogs she tells of, and seems to have been pretty sensible throughout. An easy and enjoyable read.

3. The Christmas Train is totally different from the other book by Mr. Baldacci. The main character, Tom Langdon, is a newspaper reporter who has written stories from all over the world, including many areas of violence. He has been used to flying everywhere, and for various reasons he decides to travel across the US by train over the season leading up to Christmas. He is surprised to find himself in a group who often travel by train, and who all seem to know each other. A bigger surprise is to discover that the woman he had loved and lost years before is also on the train, and also crossing the country. The meeting does not go well from the start; but there is quite a bit of activity among the other passengers, and he becomes involved.

4. The Summons is a mystery set in the Deep South (Mississippi mostly). The main character, Ray Atlee, is a law professor at a university in Virginia. He has escaped from the small town in Mississippi where his father, the judge, has been the law for all of Ray's life. Judge Atlee has very much controlled the community for most of forty years, and is now old and sick and has retired to his ancestral mansion. Both of his sons have left the town and settled elsewhere. The second son, Forrest, has not established himself anywhere respectable, and has been in trouble most of his life. The story begins with Ray receiving a letter which says that his father is on the verge of death and would like both of his sons to come home and find out about his will. Ray reluctantly goes and finds the judge already lying dead, with his will all written out, leaving all of his property to be divided between his two sons. There is not much property in fact; the house is the main asset. To his surprise, however, Ray finds a cupboard full of boxes hundred dollar bills, some three million dollars. No identification, no explanation. Most of the story tells how Ray tries to protect the money and to find out where it came from. During these efforts, he realises that someone else knows about the money and is after it. He does finally figure out where it came from, and who are the men trying to get it from him. He survives their efforts, and finds out all the truth about the money in a surprise ending. An exciting read.

5. The Innocent Man is a bit of a surprise. It tells the true story of a man found guilty of an unpleasant rape and murder which he did not commit. There is a great deal of detail of his lawyers' efforts to save him, and also of the efforts of the local police to convict him; they made up their minds that he was the one and never looked at anyone else. How they mishandled the evidence, and changed the witness statements, is all described. It is hard to credit that the police would act as described, but apparently it is all true. The action takes place in a small town in the state of Oklahoma in the US. Perhaps things like this do happen more often than we ever hear about, but we have to hope not. Thanks to Mr Grisham for telling us about this instance; happily, he was also able to tell us how the man's innocence was finally established. A long read, but satisfying in the end.

6. Foul Matter is a strange sort of mystery: no detectives. The characters are all involved in the publishing industry, which apparently is more cut-throat than most of us would have expected. No actual dead bodies, but we do meet three assassins, a publisher who hires them to kill off one of his authors, and an author whose complex manoeuvres to entertain himself almost have had bad consequences. The assassins are, in fact, very entertaining as well as surprisingly ethical; they make the book worth reading.

7. Empty Nets is the story of Mr Etchegary's more than 60 years' involvement with the fishing industry of Newfoundland and Labrador at all levels. Anyone who reads it will be convinced that he knows what he is talking about; and, if the federal politicians in particular had listened to his suggestions over the years, the provincial fishing industry would be in a much better position. At 23 he began working with Fishery Products Limited as an electrician, and he stayed with that company through many changes. He progressed through different management levels, and became very familiar with different aspects such as harvesting, processing, and sales. He seems to have related well to others in the different disciplines, and to have learned a lot in each one. He also had the opportunity to travel to many other countries, and to learn how they did things, and to make many useful contacts. As a representative to ICNAF and NAFO and many other bodies speaking for the fishermen, his big concern was the health of the fish stocks. Politicians, however, could not see any problems, and they encouraged ever more activity that used up the stocks.

power at the Federal level and therefore never had chance to appoint their own Senators.

Perhaps the most significant effect of Trudeau's action is to wake up the Harper government which has done virtually nothing in their seven plus years of governing to change the Senate's function or to abolish it completely, as they said they would. To this point Harper has said little about it except to make fun of it, as he tries to do with any Opposition move with which he disagrees.

LIBERAL SENATORS become SENATE LIBERALS

ELECTED NEWLY AS LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA, Justin Trudeau has been in no hurry to make himself noticed on the political scene. But his recent statement about changes to the status of Liberal Senators has drawn attention from political watchers all across the country, many of whom have hailed it as a harbinger of change which may become more significant as time passes.

Effective immediately, as the month of January was drawing to a close, the thirty-two Liberal Senators are no longer members of the National Liberal caucus, meaning that they will no longer have input to legislation the Liberal Opposition in the House of Commons will vote on or initiate. As well as this, Trudeau has withdrawn whip control of their voting in the Senate, thus making them free agents when they cast their votes on legislation presented to the Senate by the House of Commons: they may vote on it in any way they choose. However it is unlikely that they will vote much differently from the way they would have, if Trudeau had not intervened. They will still be able to take part in all other Senate business, including to propose new legislation from the Senate. Such action has not been a large part of the Senate's function in the past, and in the present Senate, with fifty-nine Conservative Senators who are still under Harper's whip, any such Opposition moves would be very unlikely to carry. The NDP of course has no Senators since they have never held governing

The Silence of the Labs documentary by CBC's Fifth Estate

On Friday evening 2014 January 10, CBC's current affairs program The Fifth Estate aired a documentary The Silence of the Labs (Laboratories, not Lambs, or the breed of dogs). They are the many Laboratories and research locations in Arctic Canada whose funding has been cut off by the Harper Conservative government because those projects either do not directly support Conservative policy or are deemed to be non-essential in other ways to Canada's needs.

The most affected are studies of the effects of global warming (a fact many Harperites deny) and toxic pollution on the environment and lives of Innuit people, but also affected are studies of cultural and historical topics.

The documentary features several people (Dr Peter Ross, Dr Tom Duck, Dr Pat Sutherland) whose work has been cancelled and lost, perhaps even destroyed. In many cases, too, hundreds of highly skilled researchers have moved to the USA, UK, and elsewhere to find jobs. They are unlikely ever to return to Canada, which is so hostile to any work that does not toe the Tory party line.

If you did not see the original airing of The Silence of the Labs, it is available on line. Food for thought—How much longer can we tolerate a federal government which disregards scientific facts and instead bases its policies on theories and political ideology?

many fish plants were encouraged; fishing quotas were increased recklessly; foreign overfishing, especially using factory freezer trawlers, was not regulated; even claiming the 200-mile limit still was not enough. Then, when the politicians had pretty much ruined the industry, they still insisted on moving in and trying to 'fix' things; and they would not listen to any advice from anybody who knew about fishing from the inside. It is a sad story, which most of us are somewhat familiar with; but some of us surely missed out on some of the political aspects. It certainly does not seem as if a strong fishing economy in Newfoundland, with accompanying strong employment, figured much in anybody's calculations.

EXTRA BOOK REVIEW

Title: THE SHACK - Where tragedy confronts eternity
Author: YOUNG, William Paul
Publisher: Windblown Media, Newbury Park, CA, USA, 252 pages, with foreword

This book is a novel with a moving narrative about a family man whose youngest daughter is abducted during a moment of crisis during a family summer vacation and is eventually found murdered in a remote shack in the woods. However the plot quickly becomes much more than that. It's tempting to say that it is a theological treatise on the conflict between good and evil, but that would be misleading and likely to put off many potential readers: it never becomes a technical academic presentation of religious theories, nor does it get bogged down in abstruse theology. It can therefore be read purely as a novel by those who are so inclined.

Perhaps the simplest description of the novel is that it gives us an insight into the devastating grief of Mackenzie Allen Phillips, "Mack", when the loss of his daughter dominates his emotional stability and causes him to question the naïve brand of religious "faith" he has embraced during his life to this point. We understand then that Mack is every man (or woman) who has had to face the death of a loved one and begun then to doubt whether the "God" he or she has taken for granted so far is really worth heeding any more. Mack's questions are typical of anyone who has faced such doubts when life's events seem to indicate a world where evil can so easily dominate, leaving no alternative but despair.

But when Mack receives a mysterious letter in the mail, his life begins to change, and events start to move inexorably towards a new and different resolution of the question, "Is there a God who truly cares for humanity?" For many sceptics of the existence of a spiritual world the events Mack experiences may be unconvincing, but as he is slowly led through his own scepticism a new and more acceptable pathway is revealed to him of a loving deity, but certainly not the wishy-washy bleeding heart liberal kind that many would expect.

It is possible that many who have had personal crises of tragedy and faith as Mack did, may find this book to be some help in understanding and perhaps resolving them. It is not however a panacea for religious scepticism, but it may point to a reasonable route for some who are perplexed with the evil in the world and why it can still happen under the control of a benevolent and loving God.

The novel is very readable and most readers will relate easily to Mack in his emotional anguish. It may even inspire some of those with serious faith issues, but of course faith is belief, so there can be no guarantee that everyone's doubts will be resolved. And if you are one of those who does not claim to be a religious believer at all, you may find the book helping you to understand a little better those who do. Give it a try anyway: you may still find yourself, as St Paul said in 1 Corinthians 13, v12, seeing "through a glass, darkly", but perhaps a bit less darkly than before.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SAVING MONEY ON BACKS OF CANADA'S WAR VETERANS

Canadian Veterans of all military service this country has provided in foreign operations have once more been short-changed by the Government. A total of nine offices that serve the needs of Veterans all across Canada, including Corner Brook, have been closed as of Friday 2014 February 01, a move which has upset many of our men and women who served faithfully overseas in several wars and peace-keeping efforts. And the most pathetic aspect of this move to save money by Conservative Minister of Veterans' Affairs Julian Fantino is that the savings thus achieved are so minimal in comparison with other government expenditures that one must conclude that it was not worth doing.

Many of the Vets are disabled, many are seniors, and many live so far from the offices they must now use that they will be forced to travel long distances at considerable expense. Vets in the Corner Brook area, for example, must now make a trip to St John's, or make a long distance phone call if they need to consult with government officials over problems they may have with their pensions or other services vital to their needs.

The Government claims that services will actually improve; but how often is it true that when changes are made to save money, that improvements actually do happen? At the same time this Federal Government has spent $100 million on advertising their Economic Action Plan. Wouldn't the $100 million plus used on this advertising campaign have gone far to support not only the offices being closed at this time, but even to enhance the medical and psychological services that many of our Vets are having difficulty receiving?

When one looks at the something like the EAP advertising, one is forced to question where the values of this Harper government truly lie. Our support should be fully behind those Vets who risked life, limb, and emotional and mental stability in the defence of their country. If you support our military Veterans, let it be known.

The book reviewed at left is available in our Blowmedown Provincial Library and I understand that a good number of people have already borrowed it, finding it well worth reading and thought-provoking. Many have remarked that they may read it a second time to understand better the ideas it presents. I have had the same reaction to it myself, after thinking at first that "it was not my kind of book". But as I read further I became hooked, and have been thinking a lot about it every day since I finished it.

Winter Morning Scene, January 2014*Glendale United Church, Cape Breton Island, NSFounded 1929*

This little church is situated close by the TransCanada Highway in Cape Breton Island, not far from Baddeck, the birthplace of Alexander Graham Bell. The building is not especially remarkable, but it always attracts my attention when I drive along that stretch of road and suddenly, there it appears ahead. This time I noticed particularly the magnificent blue sky and the wintry clouds in strong contrast with the dark evergreens around the church, and the deep snow, clean and white, not yet illuminated by the watery but brilliant January sun which would soon rise above the hill to the left. Cape Breton has many of these striking little churches, representing most of the major denominations. The Nova Scotians who built them often selected the most striking and beautiful settings, and even today the churches are usually well cared for, like this one.
